I am a Sport Marketing major, so I do not have much experience with technology. My earliest memory I have regarding technology would be a kit that I got one year for kids to "build a lightbulb." However, I never actually was able to complete it, because I was not patient and did not want to read the directions. But I would say I started using technology more regularly in lower school when we started using computers and also when I got an iPod.

I am not trained in technology. I have never taken a class before that uses technology. Most of my professors do not even allow computers in class. In relation to the other students in the class I would say I am not trained at all. I figured out early in the first day of class, that most of the students knew exactly what they were doing. Because I do not have experience with technology, I do not know what my strengths and weaknesses are.

I think that in today’s world, everyone needs to know how to use technology. In the sports industry, the marketing is becoming more digital. But I would not say my job prospects are limited based on technology information I already know.

I do not know what to expect out of this class. I might realize that technology is not something that I am good at or I might end up liking it. At this point I am not sure.
